PREFACE

At the time Donald Oehlerts wrote his preface in 1958, the world of newspapers seemed very stable, an industry that was confident and strong. Advertising was robust, circulation was growing, and the delivery of the daily newspaper to your doorstep was, for the most part, reliable, depending on your paper boy.

But looks can be deceiving as the newspaper industry was experiencing subtle changes during the post-World War II years and, some may argue, even going back to the early 20th century. By the early 1950s, the number of daily newspapers across the country was beginning to decline, albeit slowly, but the trend had begun. The number of daily newspapers in Wisconsin declined after peaking at 63 newspapers in 1905, dropping to 50 in 1921 and 38 in 1960. The number of Wisconsin weekly newspapers also declined, dropping from a high of 591 in 1905 to 306 by 1938 and to 271 by 1959.

Newspapers in Wisconsin and across the country were witnessing changes and trends in the industry over the years, including an increase in consolidations as chain ownership grew. Post-World War II trends, including suburbanization, rising costs and technology, were putting pressure on newspapers to change and adapt. But, ownership and publishers, on the whole, did not take heed of the warning signs. Growing circulation numbers and increased advertising revenue made for “blind eyes” and complacency. The ubiquitous arrogance of those running the newspaper industry kept it them from believing that newspapers would ever not be read. And, based on some of the numbers, why would they ever think otherwise?

Newspapers had a stranglehold on the media market in the late 1950s. The household penetration of newspapers continued to be over one hundred percent. That is not to say that every household in the state and country received a newspaper, but the penetration number was over one hundred percent due to the fact that in many of the households since the early 20th century, more than one newspaper a day was read. But, heading into the 1960s, newspapers began to enter into a new era after decades of being the dominant media source. Television news came to the forefront during the 1960s, from the first televised presidential debates in 1960, to the Kennedy assassination coverage in 1963, to the space program and the Vietnam War throughout the rest of the decade. As television was beginning to flex its news media muscles, the American audience became accustomed to turning to television for breaking news coverage and the evening news.

With additional media sources, advertisers found new outlets to market their products, taking advertising dollars away from newspapers. Newspapers began to feel a dent in their economic base, most drastically affecting those markets that were served by multiple newspapers. Moreover, television was also taking away people’s time during the evening that they used to spend reading the evening newspaper. The economic battle for advertising revenue coupled with the changing reading habits of afternoon newspaper subscribers caused many newspapers to fold. The number of cities in the U.S. served by two or more newspapers took a dramatic plunge, falling from 503 cities in 1923 to approximately 50 by 1980 (by 2015 the number was in single digits). By 1970, the household penetration of newspapers nationwide fell below one hundred percent for the first time since the early 20th century. By 1976, the percentage had fallen sharply to 76 percent.

The number of newspapers in the U.S. had declined since 1958 for a number of reasons beyond the growth of television—reasons ranging from economic downturns, change in reading habits, mergers, rising costs, boycotts and strikes, less advertising revenue, small town newspaper owners retiring and others.

Wisconsin newspapers, for the most part, echoed the changes taking place nationally. Despite the decreasing number of newspapers in the state, circulation and the number of readers statewide were increasing, growing to over 500,000 weekly readers and over 1 million daily readers by 1960. The circulation growth continued into the 1980s.

This new era that newspapers found themselves moving towards was just the latest in a long run of changes that had an impact on newspapers. As the old saying goes, the only constant is change and that could not be truer for Wisconsin newspapers and those across the country, especially when it came to technology.

The introduction of new printing technologies signaled the end-of-the-line for the jobs of Linotype operators and other specialized printing trades. The result was a rash of newspaper strikes across the country in cities such as Boston, Cleveland, Detroit, New York, Portland, St. Louis, St. Paul, San Jose, Seattle, and, in 1977, at Madison Newspapers, involving the Wisconsin State Journal and The Capital Times.

The 1970s brought more technological changes as the age of the computer was dawning in the newsrooms and production departments. At the same time, the design and look of newspapers were also changing. Through most of the 20th century, newspapers had a very familiar look with many stories on the front page, at times up to 30 individual articles, many with jumps to inside pages. The story count on page one went down with each passing decade, and the column width went from eight or nine in the first half of the century to six columns by the 1960s.

In the late 1970s, however, many newspapers began offering a modular look on the pages, placing articles in square or rectangular blocks that were squared off at the bottom. Also, there were fewer articles on each page and fewer jumps. The look brought a more ordered layout to the page, allowing for a neater appearance that was easier to read. A very noticeable change in the look of newspapers during the 1970s was the advent of color photographs on the cover pages. This eye catching addition to the newspapers was a readers' favorite, prompting newspapers to increase the size and display of color photography.

Another factor that had a dramatic impact on the look and feel of newspapers was the launching of USA Today in 1982, a newspaper that distributed in all 50 states. Heavy on graphics and shortened articles, the successful national daily influenced newspaper editors throughout the country and Wisconsin. More detailed graphics, charts, timelines and maps, items that fit well into the modular designed pages, were being seen in newspapers across the state as subscribers enjoyed the easy to read information.

The late 1970s and early 1980s brought more competition to newspapers with cable TV and the debut of the first all-news TV network, CNN. Newspaper editors were concerned about losing more readers so they turned to using consumer marketing research and readership surveys. Consequently much of the papers' content was being directed to certain demographic segments of the population, depending on the survey results.

From the mid-1980s to the early 2000s, computers and technology were helping to make the newsrooms more efficient and to keep the look of the newspaper fresh and modern. Graphic editors and page designers, along with their Macintosh computers, were becoming key members of the newsroom.

In the 1990s, the number of newspapers nationally continued to decline and the total circulation for the first time started to drop, but the overall profits continued to be excellent. The newspapers were generating such great annual returns that they caught the attention of venture capitalists and Wall Street. Newspapers were being purchased at inflated prices in a buying frenzy during the 1990s. Newspaper chains were adding newspapers to their growing collections. For the newspaper owners, publishers and stock investors, newspapers were on top of the world heading towards the 21st century.

But the one change in the 1990s the newspapers were not ready for and has had the most dramatic effect on the industry was the Internet. Publishers did not believe anything could ever replace the print-on-paper product. Their complacency and over confidence caused the newspaper industry to fall behind as the fast-moving online world zoomed past.

One of the initial newspaper casualties was the shrinkage of the classified ads, traditionally for years the “cash cow” of the newspaper industry. This dramatic loss of revenue, due to the upstart Craigslist, a web-based classified advertising business, and similar Internet sites, was a blow from which the newspaper industry has never recovered. Furthermore, newsprint costs continued to rise. The industry responded by shrinking the physical size of the newspapers, cutting inches from the papers’ width and by eliminating long-standing icons, such as the stock tables, TV schedules, book pages and decreasing the amount of space allotted to news.

The hit newspapers took from the Internet was just the first in a one-two punch. The second was the downturn in the economy culminating with the “Great Recession,” wreaking havoc with the newspapers’ bottom line. Subscribers were being told to pay more while they were receiving less. Besides the physical product, newspapers were beginning to trim their workforce. Once the major economic downturn occurred in the fall of 2008, the number of jobs cut from every department increased.

Newspapers nationwide and the state continued to see a decline in the number of newspapers, ad revenue and household penetration. By the year 2000, the household percentage had dipped to 53 and by 2010, the percentage had fallen below 40 percent with the downward spiral continuing. The total daily circulation stopped growing in 1999 and by 2014 it was at the lowest point since the Great Depression.

The country and state had grown in population but the newspapers were not keeping pace. By 2010, Wisconsin daily newspapers had dropped from 38 in 1960 to 33 in 2010 with daily circulation down to 724,000, after topping off at 1.2 million in the 1980s. The per capita circulation number in Wisconsin was at an all-time low at 0.13. The younger demographic was staying away from the printed newspapers, instead opting to gather their news from the Internet or social media. Newspapers countered by developing online news sites but the competition was fierce.

The newspaper industry was caught flat-footed when the Internet arrived, resulting in newspapers having to play catch-up since 2000. In part, the newspaper industry’s inability to innovate and its slowness in responding to new trends can be attributed to a common business model, the return on investment. Newspapers were notorious for not investing in improvements if there was not a clear financial return on that investment. Publishers and owners were not likely to invest in the unknown Internet in the late 1990s since they were unable to understand or foresee the potential revenue if they had acted quickly and entered on the ground floor.

Another reason young readers were not subscribers was because reading a newspaper is a learned habit, a habit that was almost engrained in people’s daily ritual during the first half of the 20th century. But, today, with so many news and entertainment alternatives, younger adults have not learned the habit of reading a newspaper. The outlook for the printed version of the daily newspaper is dim but the slim ray of hope lies with the online version of the newspaper.

Another positive area in the newspaper industry is the relative success of the weekly newspaper across the country and in Wisconsin. Wisconsin weeklies have continued to lose numbers, dropping to 193 newspapers in 2010, but the smaller community weekly offers a better chance of fending off the downward spiral compared to the regional and larger dailies. Weekly newspapers are offering their readers something that is not as readily available on the Internet or social media, and that is local, “downhome” news. Plus, the weeklies are not beholden to the large corporate chains that dictate to the dailies when and how to make budget cuts.

It is interesting to note that Oehlerts wrote in 1958 that “the urbanization, standardization, and complexity of modern American life has made the country weekly of a previous generation hopelessly obsolete and without appeal to contemporary subscribers.” Today, the weekly is holding its own and it is the daily that is becoming hopelessly obsolete, with contemporary subscribers who are looking online or to social media for news updates. It is the weekly community newspaper that has learned to stay engaged with its readers, reacting quickly to the local issues and is small enough to allow for the need to make sudden adjustments.

Newspapers down through the years have been a vital source of knowledge to historians and researchers. As Oehlerts wrote, “it [the newspaper] has served as arbiter of men and events; it uniquely serves as scribe to the passing scene....for thousands of lonely communities, untouched by greatness or importance, the local newspaper is the best and only historical record.”

Since 1846, from the Territorial days up through the digital age of today, the Wisconsin Historical Society has made it a duty to collect, preserve and share newspapers. Newspapers have through the years made up an important and impressive portion of the Society’s overall collection, aiding researchers, professors, genealogists and students of history in finding stories and people through the years. The Wisconsin Historical Society’s newspaper collection boasts of over 150,000 reels of microfilm holding over 6,000 newspaper titles, 1,600 of which are Wisconsin newspapers.

The impetus of this impressive collection started with the very early Wisconsin newspapers and editors. Chauncey C. Britt is credited with the first mention of creating a historical society in a column on Oct. 22, 1845, in his newspaper, the Mineral Point Democrat, where he called on his “brethren of the press to keep this ball in motion until the object is obtained.” The news spread throughout the Territory as other newspapers reprinted Britt’s column.

The territorial legislature did not follow up with the idea so Britt soon focused his attention on the first constitutional convention that was meeting in Madison in October of 1846. More newspapers were adding steam to the movement, including the Madison Democrat, the Madison Express, the Milwaukee Daily Sentinel and Gazette, the Fond du Lac Journal, and others. With so much support of creating a Historical Society coming from the territorial newspapers, many of the leading dignitaries attending the convention met and felt compelled to create the historical society, nearly two years before Wisconsin became a state.

The Wisconsin Argus, while supporting Britt’s urging to start a historical society, ran a column on Oct. 28, 1845, calling on fellow newspaper brethren to donate the full collections of their respective newspapers to the territorial library.

The column, entitled “A Suggestion,” reads as follows: “We would suggest to our brethren of the Territorial press, the propriety, hereafter, at the close of each volume of their respective papers, of getting a copy bound and depositing it in the Territorial library. By so doing they will make their journals more extensively known and furnish an important contribution to the public library. A full collection of Territorial papers, neatly bound and preserved in the State library, we hardly need suggest, would be of the utmost importance for future reference. Come then, brethren, let us range ourselves cheek by jowl in some vacant alcove, that we may tell the wise ones that come after us, what happened in our day.”

In spite of the interest of a number of editors and publishers in the formation of the Wisconsin Historical Society, many still had to be urged to deposit their papers with the Historical Society, as seen in the article that appeared in the Milwaukee Sentinel and Gazette on March 10, 1849:

“Gen. W.R. Smith in behalf of the Wisconsin State Historical Society, requests Editors and Publishers throughout the state, to furnish the Recording Secretary of the Society, the Rev. C. Lord, at Madison, with a complete file of their papers, past and to come, that they may be bound and deposited in the Library of the State Historical Society. These newspaper files will in time become the most valuable of the Society’s records.”

Over the many decades, the Wisconsin Historical Society has dutifully gathered and obtained many of the newspaper titles being published throughout the state. The current editors and publishers may not share the same enthusiasm for donating their respective newspapers to the Historical Society compared to their ancestral brethren of the mid-19th century, but their collection of papers is being preserved at the Wisconsin Historical Society either on film or in digital format.

The bibliography that follows is proof of the Wisconsin Historical Society’s commitment to preserving the newspapers from all corners of the state.

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of the Guide is to allow the researcher to determine: (a) whether a newspaper was published in a particular area at a particular time, and (b) to determine whether files of that paper are available for research. It lists all newspapers published in Wisconsin from December 1833 to December 2004. Publications appearing in newspaper format, but which were primarily organs of agrarian organizations, educational institutions, religious groups, or trade unions, have been excluded.

Following Oehlerts' original order, newspapers are listed alphabetically: (1) by county, (2) by locality, and (3) by masthead title. Papers are listed under the current or last place of publication and in conformity with contemporary geographical designation. Under a given locality, papers are arranged alphabetically by the scheme established by Winifred Gregory in her American Newspapers, 1821-1936, the listing being governed by the first significant word of the masthead title, ignoring the place and frequency of publication. For example, under the city of Ashland, the order would be: Ashland Journal, Weekly Leader, and Ashland Mirror.

Cross references have been made to variant places of publication and variant titles. Newspapers that transferred publication into, or outside of, the state have been listed under the last place of issue in Wisconsin. All newspapers published in a language other than English have been so noted, as have those published primarily for Black and Native-American audiences.

Names of newspaper editors have not been included in this edition. The 1958 edition includes many editors for the period of its coverage, and a detailed listing of editors and publishers for early Wisconsin newspapers is included in James L. Hansen, Wisconsin Newspapers, 1833-1850 (Madison, State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1978).

If the Wisconsin Historical Society holds any issues, those holdings are indicated in the record. Virtually all the files have been microfilmed and are, as of this writing, available to researchers on interlibrary loan. No attempt has been made to identify those files available in various online sources, primarily in resources available by subscription (usually in larger libraries). The only exception is several papers whose files, available on the subscription resource NewspaperArchive, extend beyond those held by the Wisconsin Historical Society.

Because of a dispute over the ownership of the Milwaukie Sentinel press and equipment, two competing editions of the Sentinel were published from late November through December 1844, one by Elisha Starr and George M. Shipper in connection with the (Milwaukee) Commercial Herald, and the other by John S. Fillmore and David M. Keeler in connection with the Milwaukie Daily Sentinel. In late December Starr sold out to Keeler and the two editions were consolidated. WHi has files of both editions.
